● Aim of the Course
Course offers a survey of theories and issues in International Political Economy (IPE). It will explore the major conceptual frameworks of current IPE before moving on to identify key actors and institutions in the global economy. The course then shifts to treatment of major trends and problems of the global political economy including: the transformation of international systems of production, global trade, global financialization, development and poverty, and the environment and climate change.

● Course Prerequisites
For advanced NUPACE students in Law or other Social Sciences there is no prerequisite. For G30 students at least one basic course in Political Science is required as a prerequisite. If your grade in that class was low however it is suggested you do not register for this course.

- Aim of the Course
  In this course we will explore a number of important issues in Japanese modern and contemporary literature, including the question what “literature” means in the modern period. Rather than attempting to give an exhaustive overview, we will examine issues surrounding cultural encounters in the modern world through the lens of literary texts. The selected works are discussed in close relation to their respective social and political contexts, providing students with good background knowledge of specific aspects of modern Japanese society.

- Course Prerequisites
  Interest in Japan and Japanese literature; willingness to read a different literary text each week.

- Course Content
  Thematic exploration of key issues in modern and contemporary Japanese literature.
Critical and theoretical approaches useful in any reading of literature.
Detailed syllabus distributed on Day 1.

- Course Evaluation Methods
  Attendance and participation: 30%; Reading responses: 20%; Discussion leader: 20%; Final exam: 30%.

- Notice for Students
  A literature course necessarily involves a lot of reading. For this general introductory course, we will focus on short stories where possible, but students should be prepared to read a new text every week.

  Students need to submit a Course Withdrawal Request Form when they have no intention of finishing a course during the semester.
